During the long wait Dr. Crippen gazed calmly about him or held whispered conferences with his counsel, Alfred A. Tobin, M. P., Huntley Jenkins, and Arthur Newton. He seemed to have a great deal to say to his lawyers, and was apparently not worried.

The crowd became restless as the time dragged on, and Inspector Dew seemed anxious to get away. At the time when the case was so suddenly stopped, Dew was reciting the history of the chase after Crippen and his companion.

Story of Investigation.

Story of Investigation.

The inspector went back to the very first, telling how Scotland Yard had been notified that Mrs. Crippen was mysteriously missing, and that an investigation should be made.

The detective said that Scotland Yard had first been apprised of the suspicious circumstances of Mrs. Crippen's dis appearance by John Nash, a theatrical Nash had returned America, where Mrs. Crippen's friends America, where Mrs. Crippen's friends were very much alarmed.

Following Nash's visit to the central office of London's detective force, Dew said that he went to 39 Hilldrep Crescent, North London, where the Crippens had been living, and interviewed Crippen.

The inspector later went to Crippen's office and again to his residence, according to his story on the stand.

"Crippen explained his wife's disappearance by implicating Bruce Miller, the Chicago man," said Inspector Dew. Under examination by Barrister Tobin he said:

he said:
"Dr. Crippen answered all my questions readily and allowed me to search the house without protest. He was not worrled and quite cool when we went into the cellar."

Solicitor Tobin questioned Dew keenly, but was unable to shake his story seriously. In reply to a question as to what Crippen said, Inspector Dew said:

Scores Local Option.

With several hundred women in atsongs, and pledging themselves to take up with renewed energy the fight for a dry Washington, Mrs. Winton Smith, president of the District W. C. T. U., this morning denounced local option, and declared that legislation by Congress in behalf of prohibition was the only solution to the liquor problem in Washington.

"No State can surrender its sovereignty," said Mrs. Smith, "to the extent of granting to a community the extent of granting to a community the choice to do wrong. No legislature can shirk its clear responsibility and shift it to the option of a locality.

"Nor has Congress, that rules this city, and "cerses 600 liquor selling places in the Nation's Capital, the right to shirk the responsibility, casting it off upon the residents of the District by giving them a vote on this subject. In no other matter have the people a votee."

To Hold Conference.

Going further in his story, Dew stated that, following the finding of the remains in the cellar of the Crippen home on July 13, Dr. Crippen disappeared entirely. He told how Scotland Yard men had searched among the passengers of the trans-Atlantic liners, believing that Crippen was fleeing to America, and how the French police were asked to watch American-bound ships leaving French ports.

eight months, judging from their condition," replied Dr. Pepper, in reply to one of Prosecutor Muir's questions.

"It was absolutely impossible for the remains to have been buried in the cellar from December 21, 1995, the date when Crippen leased and moved into the house," said the surgeon.

Prosecutor Muir thus took a shrewd tack to fight the possible claim which the defense gave promise of setting up, that the body had been buried in the basement at 29 Hilldrop Crescent before the Crippens moved in.

This morning's session of the convention was devoted largely to routine matters. The address of weicome to the convention was delivered by Rev. E. T. Mowbray, pastor of McKendree Methodist Church, and an eloquent response made by Mrs. A. T. Hanson, Mrs. Wilbur F.
